In his conclusion, Brown suggests that attention to the New Testament's diverse ecclesiological perspectives both strengthens and challenges Christians today. We can be strengthened by recognizing ways in which our own churches preserve a Biblical heritage, and challenged by acknowledging that every Christian community neglects portions of the New Testament.

The Churches the Apostles Left Behind makes a valuable step toward these goals. The style is popular and non-technical. Each chapter is spiced with illustrations from church history and modern church life, which will engage a wide variety of readers. Throughout the book Father Brown shows a disarming candor and even-handedness in dealing with Roman Catholic and Protestant concerns. While some readers may disagree with Brown's interpretation of certain passages or with his lists of strengths and weaknesses, his approach invites constructive discussion across denominational lines.

Brown, a Roman Catholic, based the book on the Sprunt lectures which he delivered at Union Theological Seminary in Richmond, Virginia—a Protestant seminary. Discussion there and in other ecumenical settings has enriched the value of the work for readers from diverse denominational backgrounds. Protestants and Roman Catholics will find this book to be a valuable contribution to the current discussions of issues that face Christians afresh in every generation.
